Captain Meade was satisfied with her beauty and her good-humour, with her goodness too, which was of a genuine sort. But he did not fall into sudden captivity. Marie-Irene seemed too much of a child yet, and too little of a woman. He felt as old as the world beside her. Since he was in England last he had been in love--in earnest, passionately--and mammon, with some magical letters to its name, had worsted him. He had done valiantly, and more successfully in war; for he had won the Victoria Cross. He had been wounded twice, and one of his wounds marred (if a girl chose to think so) the splendour of his countenance. Marie-Irene did not think so; for she had a natural turn towards hero-worship, but she agreed with him in feeling that he was a person of great age and experience, whose opinion might be taken on questions of casuistry, but who was not to be pelted with confetti, or otherwise evened with George's comrades of the studio whom he was permitted to introduce to his sister. Marie-Irene had made the acquaintance of one of these more than willingly. Tom Rose lived and worked under the same roof as George Denys, and had watched over him in an attack of fever the previous summer. He was as poor as a church mouse, but full of genius, and thrifty. When he was under the divine afflatus he went...
