Not illustrated. 1919 Excerpt: .and the range below the median of the third shows more extreme cases. All three curves tend to bring out the difference between the distribution of scores above the median and the distribution below. The range below is greater and more regular in its decline. The two halves of the curves show one similarity which is spurious. All the scores of 5Q or more are grouped into the last frequency because of the extreme range Figs. 16a to 17c. Distribution (in Per Cents) of Scores Above and Below the Individual Medians in the Eleven Tests Transmuted into Multiples of Q by the Original Distributions. in the graph which a few of the scores would have necessitated, --18.7Q in one case. This suggests a relation between the high and low scores of extreme variability which does not exist. Figs. 17a, 17b, and 17c represent the distribution of scores above and below the individual medians in February, 1916, February, 1917, and June, 1917 respectively. Their significance is in their similarity. There is only one point of difference to note. It is the greater length of the curve in Fig. 17c when it nears the base line. The increase is not enough to be especially significant, and, moreover, it is in that part of the curve which is least reliable. However, it is in accord with the slight increase which was found in the Q of the third testing, and tends to show that these pupils became more variable...
